

Catherine O'Grady is a Research Associate with the Center for Applied Research on Substance Use and Health Disparities, Nova Southeastern University. She analyzes data from NIDA funded projects, writes portions of grants and manuscripts and prepares presentations of the results. Ms O'Grady has a background in public health, including experience providing health education for vulnerable populations in various capacities, both domestically and in rural Africa. Ms O'Grady received her MPH with a focus in Epidemiology; her research interests include the link between substance use and HIV risk and as well as factors that influence access to healthcare.